abstract: The intention of this paper is to show and to analyze Walker's often underestimated critique of racial relations in the novel The Color Purple. This analysis will be based primarily on a closer look at Nettie's letters - the narrative's embedded text that has been neglected by most of the early critical works on the novel. It will be shown that one of the novel's central questions is: Is a progress in race relations possible? And furthermore, that Walker's answer to that question is not at all as fairy-tale-like as many critics have claimed
